No Change in Exterior.

The exterior of the church remains unchanged, but the interior never regained its colonial splendor, and the chancel furniture and drapertes are very simple and inexpensive. There was only one aisle; the pews were large and nearly square, with benches on three sides. Children sat on the front benches, facing their parents. The pulpit was at the side of the church, near a door.

Before 1858 the old church was pronounced unsafe, cracks having / appeared in one of the gables, and the walls being slightly out of plumb. An attempt was made, by means of iron rods, to, draw the walls back into position, but proving unsuccessful, the cracked gable was pulled down, as was also a portion of each side wall, reducing the length by about one third. It is, however, more than large enough for its present congregation. The interior was altered in various particulars: two alsies took the place of one, thus reducing the is ze of the pews, while increasing their number. The pulpit was removed to the chancel.

men in the neighborhood used the metal as "sinkers" for their nets. The beautiful hangings were cut to pieces, doors and windows suffered to fall from their hinges, and nothing left in the church which was coveted by any chance intruder. The silver
